Quarterly fund commentary

High yield and emerging market credit experienced strong performance early in the quarter before suffering a sell-off in November and December. Strong economic data in the US led to expectations that the US Federal Reserve would commence "lift-off" in December. Commodity prices declined further dragging down issues in the energy and metals and mining industries in particular. Portfolio managers increased exposure to high yield early in the quarter and quickly reduced exposure through both cash securities and derivatives after the strong October rally. We continue to believe emerging markets face headwinds for growth given high levels of domestic debt, so we have reduced exposure to EM generally through credit default swaps. Nevertheless, our analysts continue to find select opportunities in individual emerging market related securities. We believe growth weakness in China is likely to weigh heavily on the Asia Pacific region. As such the fund has benefitted from a reduction in Asia-ex Japan exposure through credit default swaps as well as opportunistic exposure to Australian government debt.
