Quarterly fund commentary

Asia ex-Japan equity markets fell in Q3, with a sharp fall in Greater China equity markets as concerns over the impact of China's economic slowdown in the outlook for global growth shook investor confidence. No Asian equity market was immune to the sell-off, with evidence of weaker global growth in the continued deceleration in exports from ASEAN countries. Consumer-related sectors lagged the broader market over the period as weak economic data saw an increase in investor risk aversion. However, consumer discretionary stocks in South Korea posted gains for the quarter, benefiting from fiscal stimulus measures intended to support demand. Despite the near-term uncertainty in the outlook for consumer spending in Asia, we continue to believe Asian consumer demand is a long-term secular growth theme. We believe the fund is relatively diversified, with positions across the consumer discretionary, consumer staples, financial and healthcare sectors, which we believe offer plenty of stock opportunities that are likely to benefit from various consumption themes. In terms of stock selection, we continue to favour local home-grown companies with strong brands and a solid understanding of local Asian consumer demand.
