Quarterly fund commentary

Our low-volatility strategy of underweighting in duration (a measure of a bond's sensitivity to interest rate changes) versus the benchmark index and maintaining an average credit rating of investment grade for the portfolio successfully helped the fund achieve strong risk-adjusted returns in the first quarter of 2017 despite another rate hike by the US Federal Reserve in March. The recent economic data from China and across most Asian countries point to a goldilocks scenario of slight economic recovery and mild consumer price inflationary pressures. The first meeting between the US President Trump and China President Xi in early April has eased market concerns of trade war between the two countries. The economic reform momentum in India and Indonesia is strong. We will look for opportunities to increase weightings of these two countries in the fund. Nevertheless, we remain worried about further escalation of geopolitical risk in the Korean Peninsula. Hence, we will continue to underweight in Korea bonds. As the US has entered an interest rate hike cycle, we will continue to keep interest rate risk lower than the benchmark. As the US dollar remains on a secular trend of strengthening against Asian currencies, we will continue to avoid Asian local currency exposures. Also, the fund seeks to maintain the average credit rating at investment grade.
