Quarterly fund commentary

Global equity market volatility increased in the weeks prior to the US Presidential election, but US equities turned sharply higher following Donald Trump's unexpected victory. Non-US equities traded lower on the news and, in particular, emerging markets declined due to currency weakness and the prospect of a less favorable trade environment. For the quarter, most major global indexes posted losses. In this environment, the fund underperformed the MSCI World Consumer Discretionary index, primarily as a result of an overweight exposure to the software and internet software & services industries, not held in the index. In contrast, stock selection in the media, and hotels, restaurants & leisure industries contributed to relative performance. Overweight exposure to the media industry also helped. The fund is positioned with exposure to the following trends that we expect will continue for the foreseeable future: A) income growth in emerging markets (EM) will outpace US income growth and companies with exposure to both high and low-end discretionary spending will continue to experience more rapid growth in EM than US and Europe-focused peers; B) the shift toward increased online retail consumption will continue to take market share from traditional retailers; and C) the shift towards online media consumption will continue to take market share from more traditional formats.
