Quarterly fund commentary

The quarter opened with the biggest sell-off in bonds since the taper tantrum of 2013 as data showed hints of accelerating inflation and economic growth. However, the US presidential election soon took centre stage and kept a lid on market optimism as the result remained in question. Donald Trump's victory provided the second political shock of the year and added impetus to already buoyant equity markets. The government bond sell-off continued and equities soared to new highs in the US and the UK. Divergent monetary policy moved the US dollar higher, most markedly against the euro, and commodities continued to strengthen. Our portfolio remained relatively stable. We added a new inflation idea reflecting a belief that inflation expectations in the US will pick up relative to those in the UK. We closed our consumer staples versus discretionary equity idea in the US, the idea was already under review as it was approaching our return target and had been useful in falling markets previously, however, performance reversed sharply following the Trump victory and we did not believe it would offer the same diversification going forward. We also closed our idea preferring the Norwegian krone to the British pound, which had performed well year-to-date thanks to the recovery in the oil price and Brexit-related sterling weakness.
